things you should know about cloud security

Everyone who has access to your cryptographic keys has full access to your sensitive data.

Your business, your data – don't give up control of your data and avoid unnecessary damage and heavy penalties.

Your encryption and key management should take place outside the applications you want to protect. Only this guarantees that no administrator can access the data.

Only you are responsible for handling critical data. This cannot be delegated.

You are not only facing high penalties, your reputation can also suffer considerable damage.

The eperi Gateway: state of the art

The eperi Gateway is the basis for all eperi Cloud Data Protection solutions. It protects sensitive business data and applications through encryption and pseudonymization before they are processed in the cloud. Key management and encryption take place exclusively within your own company before the data is sent to the cloud. This means that only you retain control and guarantee compliance with data protection policies on all devices and platforms. The eperi Gateway has a patented template architecture. Templates control which data fields are encrypted, tokenized or left in plain text for any cloud or business application.
